

Many happy returns: Bordeaux 2005 from the bottle

Our man in Bordeaux, Gavin Quinney, re-assesses the vintage of the century

In case you hadn't heard, 2005 was the greatest vintage in Bordeaux in living memory. And, having tasted 450 of the leading wines from the bottle – the first "critic" to have done so – I urge you to catch some of these wonderful wines before prices rise once again, or before many become impossible to find.

Whether you are looking to invest in a few cases for the long term, or are looking for a tasty drop for a tenner a bottle, there are still stocks available from UK merchants.

Unlike the mad stampede of the barrel tastings last April, when the press and the trade from the world of wine come to town, my tasting marathon of 2005s has been a personal labour of love. I have been to almost 100 chateaux and tasting rooms around Bordeaux between September to November 2007, and listed here is a summary of the best wines.

No other vintage has produced so many brilliant wines across the region as a whole. But there are some mediocre wines, too; so my advice is not to think, "2005 – this must be good", but to choose carefully.

The best wines have come from the best run estates with the best vineyards – which may sound like the bleedin' obvious, but in such a warm, dry year like 2005, terroir played a crucial role. Vines really deliver what matters when they are on the edge, with access to just enough moisture in the subsoils to sustain them at the crucial stages. So it's no surprise then that the top spots were the gravelly mounds overlooking the Gironde – whether in Margaux, St-Julien, St-Estephe, Pauillac or the Haut Médoc – the precocious soils of Pessac-Léognan, the clay and limestone as well as the gravel terroirs around St-Emilion, or the famous plateau in Pomerol. Great values can also be had from excellent sites, such as in Fronsac and in the Côtes, especially Castillon.

Fields of gold: the 2005 harvest at Château Angelus yielded near perfection – and wine that now sells for £1,600 a case, in bond

The vast majority of wines that I tasted from the bottle were true to the barrel samples that I tasted in April 2006. Indeed, many have improved in the barrel, while only a handful of wines have fallen slightly short of my original assessments for the Top 100 wines in the May 2006 issue.

Now that the wines have been bottled, which took place between April and September this year (except Chateaux Margaux, Yquem and Pavie, who have held on for longer), the hallmarks of the vintage are again evident: stunning wines with deep colour and a core of delicious ripe fruit, amazing balance and length, and extraordinary freshness given the high counts of tannin, alcohol and acidity.

What about the exorbitant prices? The First Growths, despite some enormous increases over previous vintages, have proved a sound investment as re-sale values are up between 30 per cent and 100 per cent in fewer than 18 months. Not a bad return. Meanwhile, some highly rated wines have continued to rise in price, but there are still some values out there.

The lists over the next few pages are designed to be a buyer's guide, not an in-depth tasting analysis, wine-by-wine. If you take up my suggestions for the selections I call the "3i" boxes – the choices for Investors, Insiders and Imbibers – you will not be disappointed.

As always, buy from a merchant that you can trust, as delivery may be some months away; and if you are buying for investment or your storage space is next to the boiler, keep the wine in bond. ►

How to use this guide

Over the following pages, wines I scored 88 points or higher (out of 100) are listed by appellation, with those rated 90 or more being outstanding. Wines I tasted recently from the bottle – as well as from barrel last year – are rated with a single score, whereas those I tasted prior to bottling are marked with a spread (for example, 96-98).

Go to bordeauxreport.com for my tasting notes and maturity dates. Overleaf, prices in the first column refer to the opening prices en primeur last May and June, compared to the current price of a case in bond (ie excluding duty and Vat), as of November 2007. Increases over 10 per cent are noted. Track down where to buy the wines on wine-seacher.com.

Margaux

Château Margaux, tasted just prior to bottling in November (the last Cru Classé from the Médoc to be bottled) is arguably the wine of the vintage. It will be best from 2015 and will last 40 years. The second wine, Pavillon Rouge, is their best yet, and Palmer is breathtaking. In all, 2005 is a brilliant vintage in Margaux, and the appellation offers a stack of top-flight wines for reasonable prices – notably d'Issan, Brane Cantenac and Giscours. Approach them after seven years, while Boyd-Cantenac needs more time. Mr Parker will score Lascombes even higher, methinks. Less expensive values include Ferrière and a host of lesser Crus like d'Angludet, Labégorce Zédé and d'Arsac, and second wines.

St-Julien

A seriously successful vintage here. Léoville Las Cases is of First Growth quality and Ducru-Beaucaillou and the other two Léovilles are close behind. Léovilles Las Cases and Barton, and Branaire Ducru, should be locked away for a decade or more, whereas Ducru-Beaucaillou, Poyferré, Saint Pierre, Lagrange and Beychevelle will be approachable after seven years. Some truly delicious “second” wines are here – not least Clos du Marquis, La Croix de Beaucaillou and Moulin Riche, and there are real values to be had under £200.

Prices for Cos and Calon now look reasonable in the light of the Firsts and the context of the vintage, and Haut Marbuzet have made their best wine to date. Patience is required for the first four wines – drink 2015 to 2030.

First Growths Latour and Lafite are magical wines with different personalities: the power and the beauty. Then follow several estates that are punching above their weight, with Pontet Canet leading the way in value. The first five listed below need at least a decade in the cellar and will last 30 years-plus. Clerc Milon is a good bet, along with several other wines for under £300 a case.

Haut-Médoc and other appellations

Differing styles here, and plenty of values: the revitalised La Lagune, from the southern end of the Haut-Médoc near Margaux, has turned in a stunning, elegant effort, and unclassified Sociando Mallet – from north of St-Estephe – a powerful, muscular wine for the long haul. La Tour Carnet is a big wine while Poujeaux from Moulis is superb. There are several great values from the Haut-Médoc, notably Belgrave, Sénéjac, Charmail and Beaumont. See bordeauxreport.com for a broader list.

St-Emilion

A huge appellation that dwarfs those above, with many smaller estates. So it's no surprise that there is a stash of great wines, given that 2005 is a special vintage for St-Emilion – but careful selection is required. Lots of styles, too, so I have asterisked those wines that are huge, full bodied, powerful wines as they are not for everyone. I love them – but expect even bigger scores for these from Robert Parker. My advice is to check the prices and look for relative values, starting with A for Angélus. A truly amazing wine, as is Cheval Blanc, which flirts with perfection. Only Troplong Mondot didn't want to show their wine at this stage, so my note is from last June.

The team that make Pétrus think the current price is "indecent". If you want something of similar quality that doesn't require a second mortgage (just a fortnight's school fees), go for l'Evangile. There is a gap between the best vineyards on the plateau and the rest, both in terms of quality and price, but we can't all drive Ferraris. Sweet whites: Sauternes and Barsac

A fabulous vintage, perhaps just a shade behind 2001, with Yquem in another class. It will be bottled next April, but right now, assembled and in the tank, it is sublime. You can still taste it as you are driving back up the autoroute. Prices haven't moved a great deal, so many wines are reasonable. These are more for pure pleasure than investment – Rieussec, La Tour Blanche, Suduiraut and Guiraud especially – and they can be tackled quite soon. Drink 2009-2020.
